The following is an extract of certain portions of a transcript of an interview by Andrew N. Liveris, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of The Dow Chemical Company, given at the 2016 IHS Energy CERAWeek Conference.

ANDREW LIVERIS, CEO OF THE DOW CHEMICAL COMPANY: Thank you Dan. It's great to be back this year and great to see the continued success of this forum. This room is not without its own mergers of large size in the oil and gas industry in terms of risk share, understanding the power of two companies coming together for many, many years now. It's sort of standard. The industrial logic of the world of chemistry has in the last many, many years, had the same forces, which is it's like an arms race to keep scaling up to spend huge CAPEX and huge R&D dollars against trends that humanity needs to solve, whether it's a supply of energy or whether it's to supply food needs, you name it, water, all the big issues of humanity. So companies of scale and size who are diversified to a fault that really look a portion in cap of many businesses, many markets, what's happening with public companies in particular is the need to combine forces. In this case, 300 years of existence between the two companies; two iconic American brands. The industrial logic had really started to put itself into place over ten years ago. Really that DuPont increasingly was scaling up in agriculture and food, and we at Dow were increasingly scaling up in polymers and materials. We had an ag piece. They had a polymers materials piece, and then how to put those two to better use in terms of resource management, portfolio allocations, returns over the long-term. That really was the industrial logic. And, of course, the way we've come up with it, is to put two together and create three. The third is the businesses that don't fit either of those two value propositions, that are high value add specialties in their own right. The new Dow company at the other end will be very intensely materials and polymers, R&D, science focused. The new DuPont will be agriculture and food focused.

DANIEL YERGIN: So those two names will remain?

ANDREW LIVERIS: Yeah. We just announced that last Friday. We've done a lot of work on things like where does the legacy matter? Where does the heritage matter and how did they take over? Reality says that the world of agriculture, it's a global thing. Where's your capability and where your corporate headquarters should be is kind of the last thing you work on. So $3 billion of synergies at a minimum; it's a floor, not a ceiling. That's huge shareholder valuation, a tax efficient way of getting this done, so no premium paid to each other. The shareholder overlap was immense, which enabled that structure to be put in place and frankly, to do it in a tax efficient manner and liberate these enterprises without any goodwill is incredibly powerful financially. Synergies on top of it and the value creation; it's about $30 billion of new value that we're creating out of a $130 billion merge and spin.

DANIEL YERGIN: So what is the status now?

ANDREW LIVERIS: Intense work. That's why I'm only here with you for a brief time. Thank you for having me to talk about many things that this room cares about, like I'm an energy customer. You don't get many customers here, so I'd like to maybe make some comments on that as well.

DANIEL YERGIN: The big customer.

ANDREW LIVERIS: Certainly a big customer, certainly we're putting all the details together to close this deal the back half of this year, get the synergies defined in granular detail, go to the market. We'll have our S-4 filings very soon. Ed Breen and I are joined at the hip. It's a daily conversation to launch these new enterprises sometime in the next 18 to 24 months.
