To Our Shareholders:

We are pleased to submit to you our report for the period ended September 30, 2002. The net asset value per common share at that date was $13.68. In addition, during the quarter, three $0.105 per share monthly dividends were declared and paid to common shareholders.

INVESTMENT REVIEW

For the quarter, Cohen & Steers Quality Income Realty Fund had a total return, based on income and change in net asset value, of - 9.2%. This compares to the NAREIT Equity REIT Index's* total return of - 9.1%. For the period February 28, 2002 (commencement of operations) through September 30, 2002, the fund's total return was - 1.8%, compared to NAREIT's 1.2%.

REITs faced a difficult third quarter, experiencing a negative quarterly return for the first time in a year and their worst quarterly performance in four years. Their poor performance was accompanied by one of the worst quarters, years and three-year periods in stock market history. Further, the bond bull market continued unabated as interest rates fell to generational lows -- once again dispelling the perception of the relationships among stocks, REITs and interest rates. The declines in interest rates and share prices appear to be the result of growing concern about the strength of the economic recovery and the resulting impact on corporate profitability. Indeed, earnings expectations based on both bottom-up and top-down analyses of the major stock market indexes have declined continuously over the past several months. With potential third-quarter earnings disappointments deflating share values, including those of REITs, there appeared to be few places to escape from the bear market in equities. Even with their disappointing absolute performance, however, REITs still outpaced the broader equity market by a wide margin.

In the third quarter, negative sentiment spread to the REIT sector for the first time in years. Slow job growth and rising corporate and individual bankruptcies have begun to take a toll on the credit-worthiness of many users of space, both commercial and residential. Whereas interest rates are at generational lows, they have failed to stimulate the type of growth that would be consistent with historical precedent. This has caused some to wonder whether the United States is entering a 'Japan-like' economic environment, in which we experience an unprecedented long-term economic slowdown that cannot be reversed through the use of central bank monetary policy. Also weighing heavily on investors' minds is the prospect of war against Iraq, which many fear could cause the existing slow growth climate to revert into a new recession.

Just as much of corporate America is having trouble increasing prices, many landlords too are now in a situation, for the first time in years, where they cannot raise rents. Many markets are experiencing declines in rents and landlords are increasing concessions in order to retain or attract tenants.

While a decline in new construction

(with the exception of apartments) is a positive for fundamentals in the future, the more important factor is that a shortage of tenants for most property types in most major markets has developed.

There are exceptions, of course, though very few. Most notable is retail real estate, which has been the strongest sector due to the enduring strength of the consumer. Evidence of this sector's strength can be found in stable occupancy rates, strong sales per square foot performance, and moderate net rental growth. Retail REITs, consequently, have had the best earnings growth this year -- as well as the best stock price performance -- though fears of a retrenchment in consumer spending are causing some analysts to question the sustainability of retail REITs' earnings growth. Other companies that have outperformed have done so by virtue of acquisition opportunities, refinancing events or new developments. Most sectors and companies, however, have struggled to maintain occupancies and rents. As we close in on the final months of 2002, earnings expectations have been uniformly reduced for both this year and 2003. Some sectors, such as apartment, are not expected to experience a recovery until late 2003 or early 2004.

Finally, with the phenomenon of all time low interest rates seemingly unable to ignite a stronger economy, the dreaded prospect of deflation is getting more attention. With respect to real estate, this environment has created crosscurrents that we believe have never before existed. The sluggish economy, which is precipitating pressure on rents and occupancies, should logically result in a withdrawal of credit to real estate and declining property values. Nevertheless, credit remains quite plentiful for real estate buyers and owners. Thus, offsetting lower real estate operating income has been lower financing costs. Further, because investors' return expectations are significantly lower than in recent memory, many investors are finding the potential for a bond-like return in the mid to high single digits, with a call on some future growth, quite attractive. The net result has been stable property values despite eroding fundamentals. We do not believe that this situation can persist -- either fundamentals have to improve or property values are bound to eventually fall.

INVESTMENT OUTLOOK

After nearly three years of superior investment performance, which were the result of strong real estate conditions, the REIT rally appears to have stalled in the third quarter. This seems to have coincided with the reality that real estate fundamentals are succumbing to the same economic issues that are impacting much of corporate America. Nonetheless, we are not of the belief that a new bear market in REITs is in the offing. On the contrary, we believe that the massive monetary and fiscal stimulus that has been injected into the U.S. economy will result in renewed growth. This, in fact, is already becoming evident in many economic statistics. Although job growth has been slow, our reading of economic history suggests that this is normal in the early stages of a recovery. Meanwhile, vacancy rates have stabilized for many major property types, new construction has plummeted (with the notable exception of the apartment sector) and the real estate industry as a whole has remained on very sound financial footing. This is especially true for most publicly traded REITs, which have taken advantage of favorable debt markets to strengthen their balance sheets. Consequently, we believe REITs today are poised to fully participate in any coming economic upturn.

Many people who watch the stock market closely and have been discouraged by the bear market that has been plaguing it for nearly three years seem to be among the most pessimistic about the U.S. economy. In retrospect, however, the bursting of the stock market bubble that began in 2000 has simply served to correct an extreme overvaluation of stock prices -- perhaps the greatest that ever existed. These valuations could not have been sustained no matter what the economic growth rate. Unfortunately, this process coincided with a major cyclical decline in the economy and profits, which worsened valuations and deepened this corrective process. While the decline in stock prices may not yet be complete, with the major averages at or below five year lows, we have certainly come a long way toward unwinding many excesses.

In contrast to stocks, REITs began the year 2000 having already undergone a nearly two-year correction from a modestly overvalued level in early 1998. With earnings and dividends growing steadily for the past three years, price appreciation has barely kept pace with earnings growth. As a result, REITs today are near the lowest level of their historic valuation range with respect to price/cash flow multiples and discounts from net asset values. In addition, REIT dividend yields are at all-time-wide spreads relative to fixed income instruments. While these discounted valuations may at first appear to be consistent with weakening fundamentals, we believe they have been overdone given our expectation of a stabilizing (if not expanding) economy.

The only major strategic change we have made in the recent quarter is that we have taken a substantial underweight position in the apartment sector due to the combination of a deteriorating supply and demand situation and relative valuation. The low interest rate environment -- which has made single family housing very affordable and increased the propensity to own rather than rent -- has decreased demand for rental housing. Exacerbating this has been slow job growth and household formations due to the weak economy. Whereas this weakening in demand rationally would be expected to cause a contraction in the supply of new apartments, construction almost nationwide has continued unabated. The reason: low capitalization rates for apartments and the low cost of borrowing have reduced developers' hurdle rates, and capital is still plentiful from both banks and government sponsored lenders. The resulting rise in vacancy rates has precipitated a decline in rents (as well as an increase in free rent and other concessions), which is undermining the economics of the industry. In short, landlords of apartments have little or no pricing power -- and little prospect of this changing. In addition, apartment REIT valuations have persisted at levels that are above both their historical levels and the REIT averages.

In our view, with REITs selling at an average current yield of 7%, and with an average dividend payout ratio that is below 70%, the industry is as attractively valued as ever. Furthermore, unlike many other investments in which the value of a company's assets can evaporate literally overnight, REITs own hard assets whose value has permanence, produces cash income and has growth potential. In the uncertain environment that pervades the financial markets today, we believe that REITs represent excellent value and the ability to add meaningfully to any portfolio's diversification and return potential.
