Mike Swatts: Telephone scare tactics

Comments about Frontier Communications and the Frontier-Verizon transaction in two recent opinion pieces simply do not square with the facts (“Verizon sale is too risky,” April 7, and “Verizon-Frontier deal bad for W.Va.,” April 18).

Frontier’s plan to acquire the local landline properties of Verizon in West Virginia and 13 other states will benefit consumers and businesses, our company and our employees.

Frontier is a Fortune 1000 company in the S&P 500 Index that wants to increase its presence in West Virginia, protecting and adding jobs, investing in the telecommunications infrastructure, and widely deploying broadband service.

Gary Zuckett, with the Citizens Action Group, compares Frontier to Verizon’s prior deals with FairPoint and Hawaiian Telecom, but his comparison falls short. Baseless assertions that Frontier is “a FairPoint,” or that the transaction will hurt 911 and other vital services, are irresponsible scare tactics that completely ignore the facts.

Frontier has committed to spending $279 million through 2013 on the Verizon infrastructure in West Virginia plus $48 million specifically targeted to broadband deployment if the Public Service Commission approves the transaction. Frontier has already made high speed Internet access available to 92 percent of its West Virginia customer base and continues to deploy the service.

Shannon Fink of the Communications Workers of America tries to cast doubt on Frontier’s financial strength and our ability to serve the customers we would acquire from Verizon. However, Mr. Fink’s criticisms are factually incorrect and do not reflect the true nature of the transaction.

For example, his claim that Verizon obtained the financing for the transaction on the basis of Verizon’s credit profile is simply wrong. As the CWA knows, just the opposite is true: The bonds were issued on the basis of Frontier’s credit profile.

Further, the proposed transaction will improve Frontier’s balance sheet, leaving us better prepared to serve our customers if the transaction is approved.

Similarly, Mr. Fink’s claim that the transaction “is opposed by the Public Service Commission” is incorrect. The PSC currently is reviewing the transaction, and we’re confident that -- when it reviews the comprehensive record in the case -- the commission will join seven other state commissions in approving it.

At Frontier, we take our values and our reputation to heart. We provide high-quality service and specialize in serving rural markets, small cities and suburban areas. We have been in business since 1935 and serve more than 2 million customers in 24 states. Once the transaction is completed, Frontier will be the fifth largest service provider in the country.

We are already the second largest provider in West Virginia, serving approximately 142,000 access lines and 48,000 high-speed Internet customers in 38 counties. We will serve the Verizon West Virginia customers with the same reliable systems currently available in the state, and many of the Verizon employees currently serving customers will continue to do so once the transaction is completed.

Frontier has the experience, financial strength and commitment that West Virginia deserves and needs. Let's move ahead with a transaction that protects jobs and truly benefits West Virginians.

Swatts, of Bluefield, is general manager of Frontier Communications in West Virginia.
